The general public, being also endowed with some amount of common sense will naturally ask similar questions, which, however, are not likely to be answered. An impenetrable cloud of mystery has been thrown over the case from the very first, suggestive of deep and unaccountable motives in the matter. The offence, although grave, was a very simple one, and might have been readily nunished. As Sir John Smale observed, the prisoner, under the gaol regulations, might have been flogged day by day until he was brought into a state of subjection. The natural course of events, however, was diverted; a mischievous policy of interference with details which ought to be left to the heads of departments was applied, and a commission was appointed to inquire into the matter. The appointment of a commission has a ponderous sound, suggestive of weighty things to be dealt with, but in this case the storing. A verdict of accidental death was recommission might have been almost as profitably employed in inquiring into the crigin of the word "skedaddle," which we believe was on one occasion decided by the Oxford Debating Society to have been derived The larger Directory-contains the different rom the Greek. It was proved that it was Treaties and Conventions made by China and impossible the prisoner could have effected Japan with foreign countries, together with his escape, owing to the thickness of the various Acts, Ordinances, and Regulations re- walls and the close supervision he was under. There-was, therefore, only the offence of an attempt to be dealt with, and it might have been very satisfactorily settled (except for the prisoner) by the application of the rattan. But instead of this a mountain was made out of a molehill, and Apo was elevated to the of Royal Marines should relieve the infantry position of a hero in his own eyes and those of his fellow-prisoners; and possibly also

GOOD FOR THE SOUL

The unsavoury element was disagreeable prominent in the domestic history of last week, and threatens, before long to reappear on an equally conspicuous scale. We have not heard the last of the Bradlangh and Besant prosecution; we are destined to have yet further revelations as the books and doings of the Society of the Holy Cross. As the Fruits of Philosophy and the Priest in Absolution have been classed together by the Attorney General in the House of Commons, as they would oven seem to be admitted to stand on the same footing by the Ritualists themselves, who, according to one of their supportors in the weekly press, answer Mr For syth by quoting Dr. Knowlton," no apology whatever is necessary for citing the two works in juxtaposition. Sir John Holker has admitted that the manual of Anglican sacerdotalism is obscene and disgusting; he has stigmatised the manual of the Malthusians in much the same language; but he vindicates the conduct of the Government in declining to prosecute the publishers of the former-first, on the specific ground that they have not presecuted the publishers of the latter; secondly, on the more general ground that it is no part of the duties of Government to set up for being mora censors. If there existed a public prosecutor in England, as there exists a procurator fiscal in Scotland, it is duite certain that the State would have initiated proceedings equally against Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant, and Mesers. Mackonochie, Stanton, & Co. Seeing that it has

Thomas Moore, seaman on the British ship already been decided that a libel conveyed in a letter is for legal purposes published, it cannot be argued than an 'obscene and disgusting' bool is unpublished because it is not exposed for sale on every bookstall of the kingdom. How far it is the function of the State to repress literature of this character may be a moof point; but we charged with being drunk. It appeared that the would remark that if the principle uncompreprisoner was helplessly intoxicated and fell down misingly and, as we cannot help thinking, incauat Messrs. Of course the explanation of Sir John Holker's remarkable statement, as well as the tame and meatisfactory reply of the Archbishop of Canterstruck two men looked up with him. WEATHER OR NO? As home I walked the other night, The moon was dancing in the skies. The lamp post swayed from left to right, .The payement seemed disposed to rise. Policemen round me came in crowds, And did the wildest dance together, At times I seemed to walk on clouds-All this was nothing but the weather.

I reached our square, twas turning round-How I got home I never knew; But when my room at last I found The clock's four hands struck half-past two. Done Mrs. B. sat up for me. Awake, and in her highest feather "Aw ri, 'm' deat, I'm here, you shee, Upset a little-by the weather! Next morn I thought my head would split-Twas clear there must be something wrong: For though I could not eat a bit, I called for sode all day long. MR. S. C. HALL AND THE "ART

JOURNAL" establishing a magazine devoted entirely to man Hater." By Charles Reade. art, art munufactures, and the higher class of literary contributions, and launched the Art. Union, which, under its somewhat modified and greatly improved title of Art Journal, he has continued uninterruptedly to conduct of thirty-eight years. "When, in 1839, commenced the Art Journal," says Mr. Hall, had to create a public, and I did. The newspapers gave, on certain pressing occasions, a few lines to the theme. Now, column after column accords justice to the vital subject. times showing where false pictures were but which the artists who were responsible that course, proving how little they were worth and would ultimately bring if re-sold. and at the same time producing proofs of the gradual rise in value of British pictures whensubmitted to public sale, I led the dealers! on the one hand, and the collectors on the other, to avoid old masters, and to patronise productions of artists who were yet alive to sideration they had been brought up to feel maintained where everything was broken in back, artists sold their productions at very small prices indeed; they now sell at the aucview of the Royal Academy when, during Frith, Ward, and Elmore. Each of the six painted six pictures for the sum of ten guineas each, and were content; they would now be estimated each at the value of two hundred guineas. But still more astounding is this fact: when the engraver Finden, for whom I had obtained them, and who had satisfied with his choice of an owner. paid for them (they were for a work I edited for him, 'The Beauties of Moore'), sought to re-sell them at the sums they had cost, and with that view exhibited them at a gallery in the Strand, he could find no buyers at the price of ten guineas each. I need not tell you how different is the case now, when artists are among the wealthier classes of the community. You would gladly now give a hundred pounds for a picture which in 1839 you might have so remunerative as the money invested in wisely-selected pictures." The change thus evidenced Mr. Hall may justly claim to have drawing room. He was not only one of the of self-sacrifice, of patience and kind-hearteda large share in producing. In 1839, as just stated, Mr. S. C. Hall founded, entirely himself, and on his own responsibility, the Art Journal, which has continued uninterruptedly to be published from that hour to this, and the whole of that time under his careful editorship. Changes have taken place in its proprietorship, in its size, and in its general character of the work remain the same.
